Dear Obama, art history can earn you megabucks. But so what?

The US president has apologised to an art historian for saying her career choice isn’t lucrative. But once you raise the issue of money, the deeper value of culture gets left behind.

Bigger Problem: Deep cultural prejudices and misconceptions.
Perception that Art History is impractical and doesn’t provide employable skills

Students pursue other subjects that they perceive as more lucrative

Employers hire students from other disciplines and History of Art students don’t find themselves in different types of roles
How can we break this cycle?

Research and Curricular Development.
Research Objectives:

• Find out what students are getting from their degrees in History of Art
• Find out what they want from their degrees in History of Art
• Find out what employers want from graduates
• Find out how other departments/institutions have helped students develop both professionally and academically
Main Research Tactics

- Interviews with institutions
- Surveys for students
- Student-led focus groups
- Collaboration with other Departments at Edinburgh (Moray House, Music, Biology, Fine Art, Widening Participation Team)
- Contact other universities and professional organisations

Organic matter cycling at Harmony School, Balerno
Linda Gowans, Sophie Lawson and the Kestrels

Background
The Earth system is full of cycles – a strong contrast to the often linear product pathways in our society. The organic matter cycle is one of them, it is easy to grasp with lots of potential for hands-on science and outdoor learning!

Resources from Biology Department
Music in the Community

Students taking this optional course are able to broaden their musical knowledge and skills while experiencing, hands-on, the role music can play in a variety of learning and therapeutic situations.

Music in the Community is a long-established optional Honours course within The Reid School of Music at Edinburgh College of Art (ECA).

Led by the award-winning Programme Director, Dee Isaacs, the course has been very successful in responding to community needs, particularly in educational and healthcare settings.

Students taking this optional course - and, in particular, working with local schools - foster good working relationships with teachers and are able to broaden their musical knowledge and skills while experiencing, hands-on, the role music can play in a variety of learning and therapeutic situations, such as in the development of language and literacy skills within primary schools.
Results

• Proposed new course: Art History in the Community

• Amendments to existing Work Placement Courses—new placements, assessments and approaches

• Connections to other departments and institutions

• Further Widening Participation work
What does the future hold?

• Changes to the curriculum to be introduced for 2017-18 academic year
• Further connections with other universities, institutions and departments
• Potential publications, seminars and events
• More WP work and collaboration in Scotland
• Hopefully a greater variety of opportunities for students from diverse backgrounds
